Subject: Retrofitting US Post Offices

Hello,

I had an idea that might save the State of California money and help to keep another faltering government agency viable. Why not retrofit large US post offices throughout the State (and maybe even the Country) with a portion of the facility to serve as the Health Exchange offices and walk in clinics? With the downsizing of the US postal service I am sure there is a lot of wasted space in each building with less mail and they all seem to be so large. If we want to change the current incentive of private insurance companies to keep sick people from getting treated into an incentive for sick people to get treatment instead. This might just be a way to get the new exchanges up and running by January 2014 and breath new life into the Post Offices now running out of money since they are underutilized.

Thank you for listening,
